

While that blog is no longer so active (too much work), its concepts underlay this one. At the time I'd thought it might PERHAPS be possible to segregate financial (operations) information, which lacks the curb appeal of dramatic reporting on abuse, violence, and injustice problems in the family courts, to better help people deal with it. It's technical – but also broad overview in nature.

Background of my 2012ff blog "Cold,Hard.Fact$" and why I still reference it on FamilyCourtMatters.org, the Main Street of my writing.

Nowadays (July, 2019 as of this updated intro), I don't even pretend the issues are separable, or believe they are ; instead I just keep the importance of finding and reading the financials in people's faces much more. Needless to say, this isn't the most popular way to handle the issues with people looking for moral support, social bonding, and at all stages of processing through trauma, disbelief, anger, and desire to either join or start the closest cause and show the fastest results possible.

*On July 1, 2019, I <> wrote this into my post '2017 Continues Themes from ... Table of Contents...' <>took a Screen Shot from the post (producing a *png image) to then <>print to pdf to then <>re-insert to the same "Sticky" post*

It's certainly not popular with most of the involved professionals either. My talking about it is talking about who's been backing their own career curves and specialization niches within the professions involved, as well as collegial working relationships with others in related fields (i.e., lawyer, mental health specialists, judges, social workers, accountants/consultants AND many more spinoff businesses)(i.e., publishing on-line, offline, including publishing the academic journals) ...

See full post at <http://wp.me/psBXH-5qZ>

That's a problem, but it's also key to understanding how we got here in the first place, i.e., where some professions feed off the systematic destruction and continual disruption of others. So I'm keeping the reference here, even though it's 2019 and that blog was primarily active only for a year or two in 2012. Its "PAGES" may also be good summaries, its POSTS were intended, originally, to provide one CAFR for each state and some key subsidiary states. Credit due to Walter Burien and a very few other people (mostly men) he seems to have mentored (Carl Hermann, Clint Richardson) for publicizing this information. My blogs around 2012 (see Table of Contents links provided herein!) have much to say about it.

*Filename for this pdf (from nearby *.png image with slightly earlier timestamp)*

"Background of my 2012 blog "Cold,Hard.Fact$" and why I still refer to it on FamilyCourtMatters (for post 2017 TOC, -5qZ).~~ SShot (to print to pdf) 2019July01 Mon PST @ 10.40.46 AM.pdf"